

Abstract

The aim of this paper is to show the impact of automation introduction to power distribution systems on reliability indices of the system and the customer. It provides an analytical technique, generally employed for quantitative evaluations, and shows the influence of SCADA systems installation to control power distribution systems in order to improve their reliability. The results show clearly the improvements on reliability as the automation of lines switches is increased